Rick Morgan follows the Intruder from the end of the Vietnam War to its ultimate retirement. The incremental development of the airframe and its electronics are discussed along with first-hand accounts from the aircrew. The 'Mighty Tadpole' remained in production for 33 years before the last Grumman A-6 Intruder was built in 1992, an A-6E SWIP.

a two-seat twin-engined monoplane, equipped to perform carrier-based attack missions regardless of prevailing weather or light conditions. The cockpit used an unusual double pane windscreen and side-by-side seating arrangement in which the pilot sat in the left seat, while the bombardier/navigator (BN) sat to the right and slightly below.

And then, as told by Rick Morgan in his book A-6 Intruder Units 1974-96, the floor dropped out. On Jan. 7, 1991, a week before the start of Desert Storm, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney ordered the A-12 program to be cancelled for 'breach of contract'. Legal details aside, it was now obvious that the A-6 did not have an apparent successor.
